

Too much Power?

Lawyer's criss-crossing clients draw questions from some Irving leaders

By SCOTT WILLIAMS

IRVING — It is another Wednesday afternoon at City Hall, and Robert Power is huddled behind closed doors with the City Council.

Power, a private attorney and a former Irving mayor, has counseled city leaders throughout their historic fight against expansion of Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport.

But on this day, he has other business at City Hall, too.

Shortly after delivering his weekly update on airport expansion, Power is back before City Council members, seeking a permit for another client —
